THIS book is arranged into sections, made up of a table of consonants with several groups of vowels.

Each of these sections has a number, and to form ciphers it will be necessary to combine a group of vowels with the consonants in the table marked with the same number and letter.

All the ciphers combined with Sections A, B, C, D will always have nine letters, while ciphers combined with Section E will have ten letters.

It will be observed that any section by itself gives the means of representing with only one cipher from one to six sentences, or from one to six words, and can also be written in such a way as to represent nothing.

By using only the sections that form ciphers of nine letters you can write the ciphers together without experiencing the least trouble in separating them.

It is needless to say that great care should be exercised in coding a message, as its entire meaning will be altered by an omitted or a misplaced letter.

The examples contained in pages 52 to 55 will be sufficiently explicit to obtain therefrom a thorough knowledge of this method as employed in both forming and translating messages.

An important feature of this method is that by a simple transposition of the Radicals many distinct and equally comprehensive combinations can be made, thereby rendering the book of especial value for both private and commercial use.

Take, for instance, Table C No. 4. It will be seen that all the columns of consonants, excepting the last, are marked No. 1 Radical, No. 2 Radical, No. 3 Radical, No. 4 Radical. Only the consonants forming the tables are Radicals.

If we say, change Radicals C No. 4 to 4321, you will understand that the fourth column of consonants is to take the place of the first, the third the place of the second, the second the place of the third, and the first the place of the fourth; the last column, which is not numbered, remaining as before.

(See Table C No. 4.)
